Analysis of the usage of uniform coats and hats in the army of the Confederate states of America; E.Raaijmakers, M. Oosting; 7-2-2021

1 Method

The goal of this study is to determine the general trends in the type of coats and headgear used by Confederate army officers from 1861-1865.

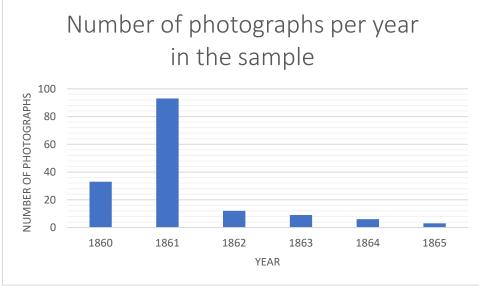

This study has been performed using the database of the Library of Congress (LOC). The images have been collected using a 'broad sweep' method using the following queries:

- 1. Confederate + Officer
- 2. Confederate + Colonel
- 3. Confederate + Major
- 4. Confederate + Captain
- 5. Confederate + Lieutenant

The following data was subsequently collected:

- Year of photography
- Unit
- Rank
- Tier (Cav/Art/Inf/Staff/Navy/Admin/Unknown)
- Description
- Coat type
- Hat type

The search yielded a total of 156 usable pictures. The amount of pictures in the sample derived from the LOC as a function of the year of photography is as follows:

2.1 Hats

The sample size is limiting in the reliablity of the analysis. These conclusions are indications regarding the type of headgear used. A bigger sample size may yield a different result.

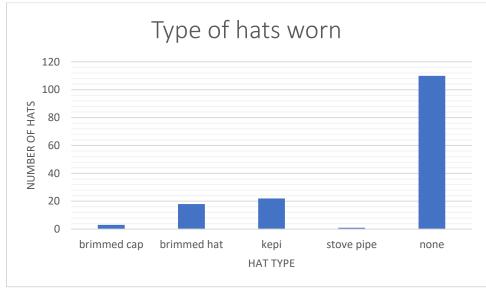

Image: General overview of the type of hats worn, regardless of rank and year

Most pictures analysed did not show a type of headgear. This does not mean a general absence of headgear. The type most used, regardless of year and rank seems tob e the kepi, followed by the brimmed hat.

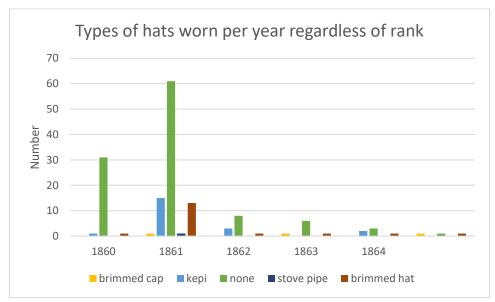

Image: General overview of the type of hats worn per year, regardless of rank

When looking at the types of headgear per year, regardless of rankm the kepi and brimmed hat stand out as most used in 1861. The amount of brimmed hats decline in the following year, mainly showing kepis. It has to be noted that most photographs analysed depicted the early years of the war.

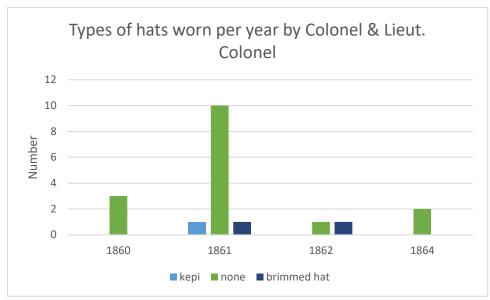

Image: Overview of the type of hats worn per year by Colonel & Lieut. Colonel

In 1861 the photo's depicting Colonels and Lieutenant Colonels depicted an equal amount of kepis and brimmed hats. The keps were absent in 1862, making way for a single brimmed hat. A bigger sample size will probaly change this balance.

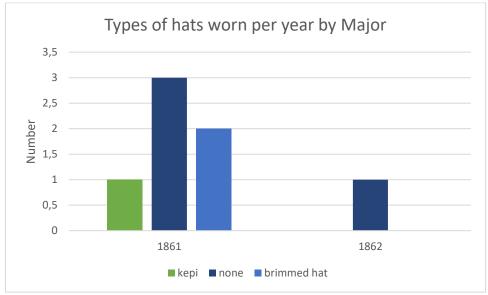

Image: Overview of the type of hats worn per year by Majors

Even though the sample size for mayors is equally small, the preferred hat type seems to be a brimmed hat. A kepis was also shown in 1 of the pictures. A biggle sample size might change the balance of types of headgear used by Majors

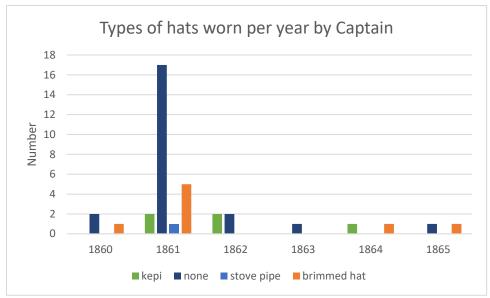

Image: Overview of the type of hats worn per year by Captains

The sample size for captains is bigger, making a better representation of the types of headgear used by people holding this rank. The brimmed hat seems to be the preferred option in 1861, followed by kepis. In 1861 the brimmed hat has dissapeared from the sample, making way for exclusively kepis. A bigger sampe size will probably reveal in increase brimmed hats, as well as kepis, being used by captains.

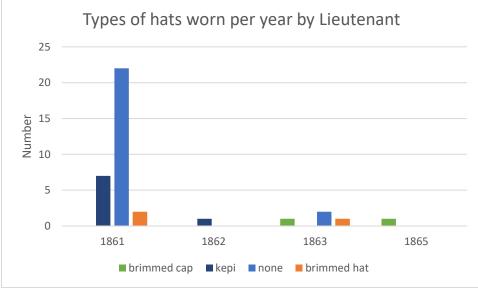

Image: Overview of the type of hats worn per year by Lieutenants

Most pictures showing Lieutenants lack the depiction of headgear. The main trend, seemingly, is the usage of kepis. A few brimmed hats were shown, but in lesser amounts. A brimmed cap (not kepi) was depicted in 1863 and 1865.

2.2 Coats

The sample size is limiting in the reliablity of the analysis. These conclusions are indications regarding the type of coat used. A bigger sample size may yield a different result.

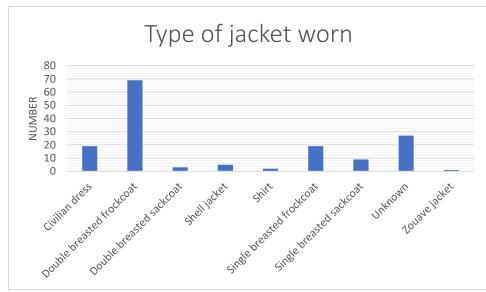

Image: General overview of the type of jackets worn, regardless of rank and year

Regardless of rank and year, the sample yielded a clear preference for the usage of double breasted frockcoats. This was followed by the usage of civilian dress and single breasted frockcoats. Furthermore, a number of shell jackets and sackscoats were present in the sample taken from the LOC.

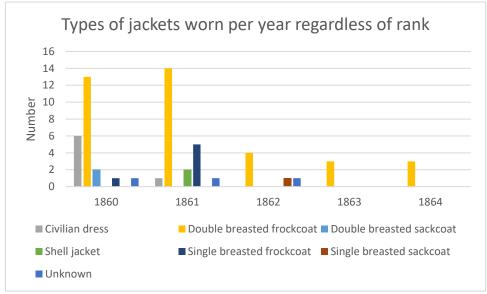

Image: General overview of the type of coats worn, regardless of rank per year

The year of 1860 showed the biggest amount of civilian dress used in the ustage and duration of the war (1861-1865). However, the double breasted frockcoat seemed to be the preferred type of jacket used during the entire war, regardless of rank. The single breasted frockcoat became more popular in 1861, with the frequency far lower than the double breasted frockcoat. Shell jackets were in use in 2 instances in 1861. Research by David (David , The confederate officers uniform coat, spring 2006) suggests an increase in the use of shell jackets during the later-war period. The lack of images taken from the LOC fails to show this pattern.

Image: Overview of the type of coats worn per year by Colonel & Lieut. Colonel

The preferred jacket/coat-type worn by Colonels & Lieut Colonels seems to be the double breasted frockcoat. Two single breasted frockcoats were shown in 1861. The pictures in the sample represting 1862 and 1864 (4) excusively depicted the usage of double breasted frockcoats.

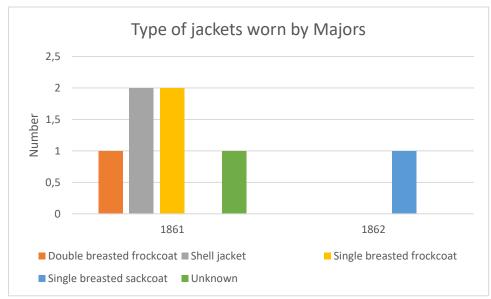

Image: Overview of the type of coats worn per year by Majors

The photographs depicting majors only represent 1861 and 1862. The sample size for both years is too small to perform any relevant analysis. A mix of jackets were used in 1861; However, no clear pattern emerges.

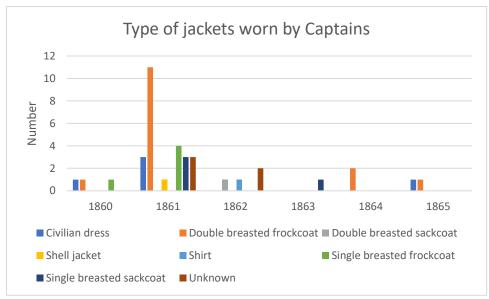

Image: Overview of the type of coats worn per year by Captains

The preferred coat type in use by Captains in 1861 appears to be the double breasted frockcoat, followed by the single breasted frockcoat. The use of civilian coats in 1861 appeared in equal amounts to the single breasted sackcoat. Later in the war, a mix of garments was used. No clear pattern emerges however.

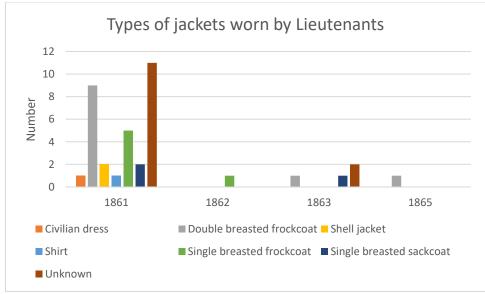

Image: Overview of the type of coats worn per year by Lieutenants

Again, the images taken from the LOC mainly show the usage of jackets in 1861. The main type shown was the double breasted frockcoat, followed by the single breasted frockcoat. A couple of shell jackets, as well as the single breasted sackcoat was shown in equal amount (4) a single civilian coat and shirt (battle shirt?) was shown. Later in the war, a mix of garments was shown. The low amount of coats in the sample prevents any clear conclusion to be made.

3 Conclusion

The sample size is too small to jump to conclusions on the later-war usage of coats and headgear. There are a couple of patterns emerging however:

Concerning hats the main mode of headgear in use seems to be the kepi and the brimmed hat. Other types did occur within this sample, but to a lesser degree. There is no clear difference in head types to be shown in use by Colonels/Lieut. Colonels and Majors, in comparison to Lieutenants and captains. There seemed to be a preference within the sample size for captians for use of brimmed hats over the usage of kepis. The pictures depicting Lieutenants depicted the opposite.

Concerning coats the preferred coat, regardless of rank, in use by confederate officers seems to be the double breasted frockcoat. A bigger variance occurs in useage for the ranks of Lieutenant and Captain. This however, might also be a result of the relatively small sample size. There is no excusive right of one rank to a type of garment within the sample analysed. The frockcoats and shell jackets appear in pictures depicting confererate officers holding the rank of Major, Captian and Lieutenant.

This study is but a small study with a sample size too small in order to conclude the general trends for the usage of hats and coats by confederate officers during the war. An expansion of the sample size would improve the quality of this study and the representivity of its conclusions. A further division of the sample size between the theaters of war would filter out any differences between the westernand eastern armies. The sample size for this study was too small to begin with, therefore this distiction has not been made.
